

We had finally made it, and to what? The inventory added up to a total of two ripped-up sofas, a chair with the stuffing coming out of it, and a broken-down record player. The first order of business was to throw out the trash and to acquire some decent furniture.

As the school days went by, we soon felt at home in our "new lounge," but found it hard to realize that those kids peeping in at us actually looked up to us. We remembered looking up to our seniors, but couldn't imagine underclassmen looking up to us. We sure didn't want to let them down. And as the year went by, we didn't let anybody down. In fact, we helped build up the morale of the school. In pep rallies and at homecoming festivities, we were heard above everyone else.

Then, finally, graduation approached. We looked forward to the "big day" with mixed joy and tears.

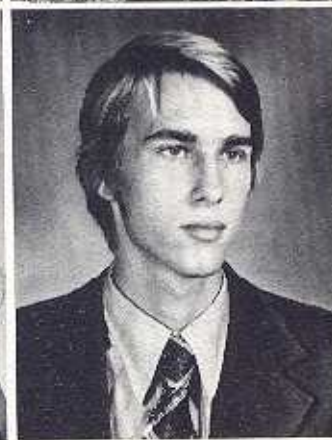

"You will come to see me some time, won't you? Surely, being separated won't end our friendship—we've had too many good times. Maybe we can all get together in a few years. I wonder how much we'll have changed."
